SPOTLIGHT ON...

NEW Graduate Writing

Writing at the graduate level is quite different from writing at the undergraduate level. As emerging scholars, graduate writers will need to become well-versed in the scholarly conversations taking place in the journals and at the conferences within their field. Where undergraduate writers may find themselves primarily writing for their professor as audience and to show mastery of subject matter as a purpose, graduate writers' audience will be their colleagues in the field, and their purpose will be to engage in conversation with and to disseminate new research to those colleagues. A graduate writer's identity as scholar requires a concurrent identity as writer.

The OWL team is working hard to update the OWL with more materials specifically directed at grad writing. Be sure to check the site as we add more.
